For Rie

Koro and Mugi

Two small things on the phone. Koro is a pocket of short corgi films. Mugi is a corgi you can call, move, and talk to. They live in the same little set of apps as House, where Mizu the axolotl is.

Koro

Open Koro and tap Watch. One film plays. It does not come back until she has seen the other five. When the pocket is empty, start another round and they return in a new order. History keeps what she has already watched.

The six films:

- The box
- Back up
- Zoomies
- Two of them
- The butterfly
- The puddle

They have sound. The speaker button mutes them. Nothing is fetched from the internet while she watches. The films are already on the phone.

Mugi

Mugi is one corgi on a wooden floor. She is not a film you only watch. You move her and she answers.

- Pinch her smaller and she goes farther away. She is the same dog, just farther back.
- Spread your fingers, or say Mugi or come, and she runs back.
- Say dance and she runs a short routine: look, trot, zoom, sit, roll. Say it again and she can do it in a new order.
- Say APT, or play a hum you recorded, and she nods. The hum is remembered, so she can nod later without the microphone.
- Play and Pause are on that recording. Mute turns her sounds off.
- Talk to her. If you start with the word read, she reads the rest out loud.
- The camera lets her look at what is in front of the phone. Ask what she sees.
- Tap her and she rolls for a scratch. Drag the ball, let go, and she chases it.

If you say house or Mizu, she goes to the shared room.

House, if you want both of them

House is one room. Mugi is on the floor. Mizu is in the tank. The window follows the hour in Osaka. Tap the bell and both come forward. Rain hits the glass. The moon puts them to sleep; tap the room and they wake. The kitchen is on the back wall: the noren, the rice cooker, the kettle, and the takoyaki.

Where to tap

From the front of the app, called Hold: Koro, Mugi, and House. Koro says For Rie on the first screen.
